As you can see, the settings are simple, you just have to define the path to your music. Older drivers might not be able to provide support for games as they were designed. Older drivers won't help with graphics glitches and I don't know why you're talking about the graphics - what are you trying to say? If you think you are seeing a graphics glitch in Dota then that's likely to be a driver problem. I never even got the impression that the graphics in Dota were glitchy. They just weren't that good back in 2009. This is a stupid idea. How do you judge what a good clip is? I know lots of people use VLC (and no doubt this is fine) but do they use the good quality setting? Do they use a hotkey to start/stop the clip? Well, we can ask about the music in games, games that are common in youtube: LoL, Dota 2, CS, TF2, CS:GO, ... How to rip them? Is the audio very good? Q: Better choice for a static blog site I am looking to host a simple static site for a blog about a certain product. The main "page" of the site will contain pages about that product, as well as a contact form and contact info. I have previously hosted a static site, and am using Apache/PHP for hosting. What would be better to do this time, and why? Also, would it be best to have separate domains for each "page" (i.e. product.mysite.com, contact.mysite.com, etc.)? Or would it be better to use subdomains (i.e. product.mysite.com, contact.mysite.com, etc.)? A: The best is a good question. I'd say whatever you use for your current website will work for this site, and will likely work much better than the shared hosting you used last time. Just make sure you have the right account set up. So either: Get a Linode box (low cost) Get a dedicated server (which has lots of resources) You can then use Apache (or Nginx or whatever) and have separate "virtual hosts" on it, one for each page you want to offer. Depending on how well you are set up you might be able to get a cheap 82157476af
